

My Voice in America's Democracy as a Kid

Democracy in America is where we all have a say in what we want our country to be in the future. Our ideas and voice can help influence our country's future . Early in life we learn in school about our government and how it is run.

As a kid in America's democracy, we may not have the right to vote. We do have the knowledge to learn about the government and their ways. We might not be able to protest, but we can share our opinion with family members and on social media.

Kids can volunteer in their communities and get involved. We can also go to our local politician's and talk to them about our opinions and the topics we believe in. We can also use our voice to change matters we believe in.

As a kid, we can start a club through our schools. We can voice our opinions to other people to help them realize there's not one way to think yet there's other ways to go around it. You can also start a campaign on what you believe in and sign petitions to speak your opinion.

As kids, we have freedom of speech. We can talk to friends, family, and local leaders about topics on where we would like to see a change in our community. We can volunteer in our community just like the veterans volunteered their lives to save our country so we could live freely.

Overall, kids have a big say in America's democracy. We learn how our voices can make a difference. In small ways we can help in our community, and learn about politics. We can learn through our schools, visit local places, volunteer in our town, share with family and friends and local leaders about our voice in America's democracy.
